Chinatown is a place where it exudes a Chinese identity in many ways. There are several shops that sell basically souvenirs and they are pretty cheap and usually they are sold in 3s. These souvenirs are usually related to Singapore, like in the form of orchid and merlion. Or related to Chinese things, like Chinese fans, Chinese traditional costume 'Qi Pao', clogs, or even Chinese cuisine.

Little India is very different compare to Chinatown. The famous Mustafa center is located in here. Indian Restaurant

Indian Restaurants in Singapore-

Singaporean love all things spicy. After you have established that you want Indian food for your next meal, the next big decision to make has to do with whether you would like North Indian cuisine or South Indian food. Here in Singapore, there's plenty of both varieties. One of the most famous Indian dishes that you have to try in Singapore is fish head curry, but what may surprise you is the fact that it is actually not traditionally Indian. While it does reflect Indian cooking in its complex use of spices, the fish head curry is more of a local creation. Without much ado, here's our list of Top Indian Restaurants for the best Indian cuisine in Singapore.

South Indian Restaurants:-

1. Murugan Idli Shop:- If you are looking for a taste of South Indian food almost like the original, head over to Murugan Idli Shop for a wide variety of dossas, chutneys and sambhars. In fact we would not be far off the mark when we say their idlis are the best in the country.

They also have quick, friendly and very efficient service, a rarity among the Indian restaurants in Singapore. A great place to stop for a quick bite of food when you have a long day ahead of you!

2. Samy's Curry Restaurant:- This restaurant tries to give homesick Indians a taste of the cooking they have left behind. With this mind, they have tried to keep it as traditional as possible, even going to the extent of serving foods on a banana leaf instead of a plate.

You should definitely try their masala chicken, Mysore mutton and their fish and potato cutlets, but take care not to miss out on their signature dish – the dish that made them famous: the fish head curry. This is a very interesting, spicy and tangy dish, served in a traditional handi (clay pot) along with chunks of eggplant and okra.

3. Muthiah Restaurant:- What started out as a simple and humble shack some 20 years ago has now blossomed into a huge restaurant that specializes in modern Chettinad cuisine – one of the largest Indian restaurants in Singapore in fact. Their top-selling items are Masala Chicken, Sambal Fish, and Masala Crab, and we highly recommend that you try them out too.

Muthiah is not just famous for its South Indian cuisine – here you can find an interesting variety of North Indian dishes as well, including both vegetarian as well as non-vegetarian options. It also has a great family environment, so you can bring your kids along for a good meal as well as a good time.

Vegetarian Restaurants:-

1. Komala Vilas:- This is one of the most famous South Indian restaurants in Singapore, and it is not difficult to see why: Komala Vilas has built quite a reputation for its simple and authentic vegetarian food, and has quite an extensive menu ranging from the traditional dossas (pancakes of rice and lentils) to parathas (flatbreads) and idlis. All of this is served along with generous servings of chutneys and sambar stews, and it is fairly easy to see why the menu at Komala Vilas is hailed throughout the entire Indian and Pakistani community as an example of the finest Indian cuisine in the country.

2. Ananda Bhavan Restaurant:- This is one of the best examples of a vegetarian restaurant that is still sticking to its roots. The Selegie Road branch that is located on the outskirts of Little India was established in 1924 and even after over 90 years of being around, there is still no air-conditioning. But that does not mean that quality is compromised in any way: in fact the attention to detail and the creativity used in the ingredients is all there! Despite having five outlets across the country, the quality of the fare and the environment both remain perfectly consistent throughout.

3. Annalakshmi:- This restaurant is part of an international chain that is more a charity restaurant and less a profit-making concern. It is managed by the Temple of Fine Arts (TFA) whose philosophy of life revolves around giving more and taking less, which has led to the “eat-what-you-want, give-what-you-feel” style of payment that characterizes this restaurant.

The food is prepared by many benevolent individuals including doctors, teachers and others prominent in the community, who participate voluntarily. The crowd comes in expectation of a good meal without any fixed payments, making it perfect for those who do not have so much money to spend.

Indian Buffet Restaurants:-

1. Rang Mahal:- The Rang Mahal is among the oldest fine dining Indian restaurants in Singapore and has worked very hard to up its game in terms of the menu as well as the décor, making it one of the most beautiful restaurants around. The buffet has something for everyone, including both vegetarian as well as non-vegetarian options. Here you will find different kinds of salads, raita, chaat and even cheesy mushrooms stuffed with paneer and coated with breadcrumbs.

We can also very proudly say that Rang Mahal has some of the best naans in the country. Whether you order butter naan, garlic naan or just the plain naan, each naan is fluffy on the inside and perfectly crisp on the outside – just the way it is supposed to be.

2. Tandoor:- Head to the Tandoor if you are looking for one of the most authentic Indian restaurants in Singapore. The restaurant may be small, but it is cozy – and the sitar music playing in the background gives you an experience you wouldn't mind repeating again and again. They only have a buffet on Sundays, but what a spread it is!

You will find all the North Indian favorites such as biryani and tikka, alongside the vegetarian favorites comprising all sorts of vegetables under the sun – even spinach and cauliflower. They also boast “live” stations where chefs prepare North Indian street food such as chaat, and South Indian favorites such as dosas on the spot. You are well advised to come hungry for this one!

North Indian restaurants:-

1. Tiffin Room:- How can we compile a list of the best Indian restaurants in Singapore and fail to mention the Tiffin Room? The Tiffin Room is tucked away in the Raffles Hotel, and gives a downright swanky and opulent dining experience that no other restaurant can match just yet.

Meals were previously served in stacked metal lunchboxes (tiffins), but these have now been replaced by luscious buffets with famous North Indian items such as chicken tikka and spicy chutneys.

2. Khansama Tandoori Restaurant:- This is one North Indian dining experience that will never disappoint you. It doesn't get any better than getting to eat tandoori chicken, aloo gobi and palak paneer straight from the stove, with piping hot, all of which is washed down with ice-cold beer! You can't go wrong with the cheesy naan – piping hot, almost as if you have had a slice of paradise served on your plate.
